

CHILDREN AND ADOLESCENTS

The Course of Life, vol. 4: Adolescence, edited by Stanley I. Greenspan, M.D., and George H. Pollock, M.D., Ph.D. Madison, Conn., International Universities Press, 1991, 519 pp., $60.00.

Adolescence, one of the most crucial phases of development in the human cycle, is approached in this volume in a most interesting way, like a corridor with many doors. We have the contribution of Peter Blos reviewing the role of the father in pre-oedipal or early male adolescent development. Blos deals with the heretofore ignored early relationship between father and son, which provides the boy a particular sense of emotional and physical security and safety.

Further subdivisions and elaborations on the substages of adolescence are given new insights and knowledge. Thus we have the work of Judith Kestenberg on the transition from childhood to adolescence, followed by several papers that elaborate on the passage from late adolescence to early adulthood. This book contains important and controversial issues connected with the homosexual adolescent and his development. It would have enriched this area of the volume if other psychoanalytic researchers, such as Richard Freidman and Susan Coates, would have contributed.

Although there is overlap in the chronological substages, this text illuminates the issues that adolescence brings out in terms of potential for disturbance and psychopathology, such as the Hilde Bruch's concept of "escape from change" in her sleeping beauty metaphor. The book also focuses on the insights into developmental psychology provided by the study of adolescent delinquents, as illustrated by Shore and Massimo. There are some innovative detours into a discussion of the relationship between family dynamics and learning disorders and a discussion of career achievement, issues that have not been tackled in other comprehensive textbooks of adolescent development. Daniel Offer contributes normative perspectives and an important caution to avoid the previous decades' mistake of considering adolescence a period of heightened psychopathology.

One issue that I did not see developed as it deserves is the complex interplay between suicidality and adolescent stages. It is not included in the subject index. I am sure that many of the authors have much to say about this important topic from a psychoanalytically inspired developmental perspective.

I consider this volume a welcome complement to traditional descriptive psychiatry. In my opinion, it is impossible to really understand psychopathological syndromes in adolescence without having grasped in depth the subjective experience of adolescents in their psychological structures—the working schemata formulated by adolescents to deal with themselves and others. In summary, this book is an enriching source to be recommended to anybody interested in human development in general and high school and college-age populations in particular.

Fundamentals of Child and Adolescent Psychopathology, by Syed Arshad Husain, M.D., F.R.C.P.(C), F.R.C.Psych., and Dennis P. Cantwell, M.D. Washington, D.C., American Psychiatric Press, 1991, 316 pp., $45.00.

This book by Drs. Husain and Cantwell is a fundamental text of child and adolescent psychopathology. It is written for students of medicine and allied disciplines, not for specialists in child and adolescent psychiatry. The guiding framework for the description of the disorders in this book is APA's DSM-III-R classification system. In this system, disorders are first described phenomenologically and then are defined by inclusion and exclusion criteria. The system also emphasizes subtyping and differential diagnoses. The conceptual implication of such a system is that these clinically defined disorders will differ in demographic factors such as age, sex, and social class; in prevalence rates; in morbid risk rates and life expectancy; and in outcome and response to different forms of therapeutic intervention.

The text is divided into three sections. The first, Introduction, comprises five chapters that discuss the history of child psychiatry; normative development focused on attachment and bonding, Piaget's cognitive development, Erikson's psychosocial development, gender identity, moral development, and temperaments; principles of assessment and tools for the assessment; purposes of and a theoretical approach to classification and elements of the DSM-III system of diagnostic classification; and types of therapeutic interventions and principles of psychopharmacotherapy in child psychiatry.

The second section, Disorders, consists of 11 chapters focused on childhood and adolescent psychiatric disorders, including disruptive behavior disorders, anxiety disorders, eating disorders, tic disorders, elimination disorders, speech disorders not elsewhere classified, mood disorders, suicide, parasomnias, developmental disorders, and other disorders such as elective mutism, identity disorder, and reactive attachment disorder. For each disorder there is a brief description or discussion of the clinical picture, natural history, etiology, epidemiology, differential diagnosis, and treatment.

The third section, Psychiatric Symptoms, Chronic Conditions, and Special Problems, contains three chapters dealing with common psychiatric symptoms that are not part of any psychopathological disorder per se (e.g., thumb and finger sucking, masturbation), psychiatric symptoms associated with chronic medical conditions (e.g., asthma, cancer, and deafness), and special problems such as physical and sexual abuse and death and dying. The meanings of the symptoms in these conditions are briefly discussed, and useful managements are described.
