

A QUICK BREAKDOWN OF SOME HEALTH LITERACY BASICS

"Literacy" has been used to indicate a basic understanding of a topic.

- Financial literacy
- Environmental literacy
- Computer literacy

Health literacy research is overwhelmingly about patients. But some research addresses health literacy as interactions between people (instead of just in a person's head).

- Patients' family members and friends
- Community members
- Health professionals (occasionally)

Context has also been receiving attention in health literacy research.

- The clinical encounter
- How individuals use health literacy skills when they're online
- How people who share a common condition 'do' health literacy.
- What educational environments might have to do with health literacy.

"Literacy" is also used to refer to a set of skills or capacities. Most often it's reading. Sometimes it's listening and talking.

- Can a patient read the information given?
- What attention is being paid to the construction of written documents by health systems?
- Is the provider speaking in a way that the patient understands?

Health literacy means people should know about biomedical subject areas.

- Medical knowledge
- Scientific knowledge
- Wellness and nutrition

Health literacy also include knowing about health care systems.

- The ways organizations work
- What different departments do and how to find them
- How health insurance works

More than "just the facts," health literacy involves having access to the ways of thinking used by those in the know.

- "It works this way because..."
- Any insider or expert knowledge
- Savoir-faire about who to talk to

Health literacy is concerned with specialized language.

- Medical jargon
- Pharmaceutical product names
- Terms that have one meaning in everyday life, and a different meaning in a specialized context ("critical," "orientation," "floor").

Health literacy also involves metacognitive processes.

- Knowing what you know
- Knowing what you don't know
- Knowing where to find out what you don't know, and how to judge its reliability
